
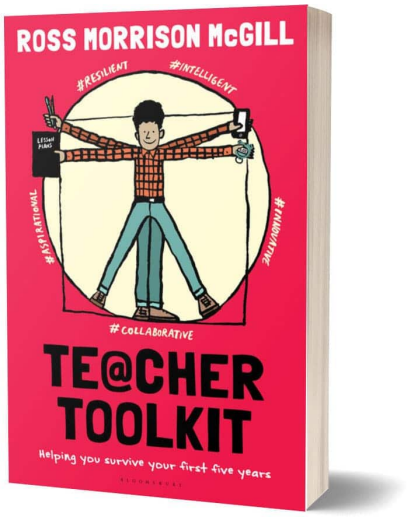
Training for new teachers...

Helping new teachers master the basics

We know that most teachers new to the profession leave within the first 5 years, but digging into teacher workforce data, the vast majority of newly qualified teachers leave after their first two years! Teacher Toolkit training helps new teachers translate complicated tasks into meaningful processes for everyday teaching in and out of the classroom, improving retention.



Moving beyond planning and behaviour

All new teachers struggle with planning and behaviour. As they develop experience, these challenges evolve into data analysis and managing a heavier workload.

Developing routines

This training strips back complex tasks into effective methodologies to help new teachers get off to a strong start. Using tried and tested pragmatic and research-informed advice, this toolkit approach will help individuals thrive within a challenging profession.

Delivery

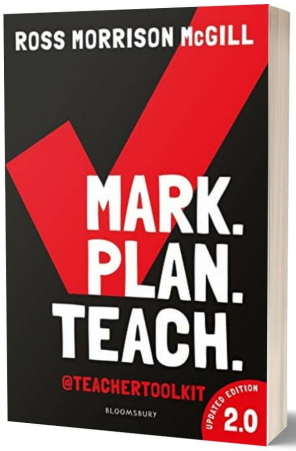
Training for all teachers...

Making complex tasks simpler to manage

Mark Plan Teach was first developed as a teaching and learning methodology in a large secondary school to support ~110 teachers. This research has since been shared with 30,000 teachers and has been introduced to over 300 schools and colleges across the world. MPT has been instrumental in shaping many teaching policies and methods...



Developing teacher autonomy

Schools and colleges seek consistency, yet no organisation can claim they have ever achieved it. So how does any team achieve any success if consistency is so inconsistent? One of the many solutions offered is to develop clarity and coherence rather than compliance.

Do less, not more

This training is full of classroom ideas and leadership strategies to demonstrate why teachers should do less, not more, to become truly effective. Ross will demonstrate how this balance can be achieved where all teachers can achieve professional autonomy.

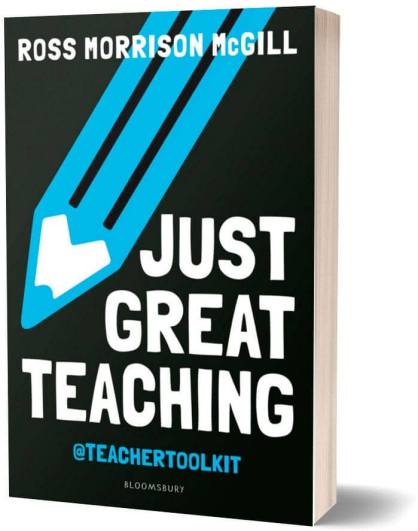
Training for leaders...

Success and challenges of UK schools

Just Great Teaching is inspired by Ross's work with 300 schools and colleges across the world. Using a macro-lens to understand what successes and challenges all schools face, Ross provides a helpful overview to allow leaders to evaluate where they sit within the profession.



Leadership matters

All schools and colleges face the same challenges, but how they deal with them will be unique to their own context. There are some approaches all organisations can apply, regardless of context. The crux: It's not what you do, but how you do it that matters.

Strengthening organisational links

This research-based training will show leaders how to take action, zooming in on quality assurance processes for appraisal, action research, observations, as well as learning some new academic frameworks. Ten key aspects of school life can be delivered...

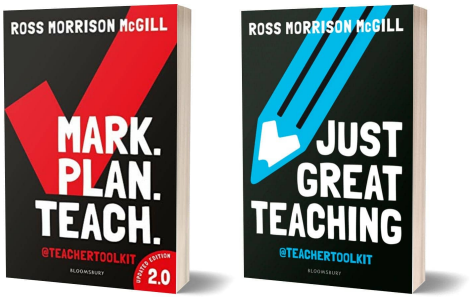
More training for leaders...

Growing great teachers

We know that coaching and developing teachers by observation can be transformational, but how it is applied in schools and colleges is a hit and miss. Alongside the stigma and myths associated with coaching and lesson observations, implementing quality conversations across an organisation is a significant challenge.



Research–informed practice

We know the quality of teaching matters more than anything else. We also know that people need to be understood in order to develop their true potential; to be supported and challenged within a trusted relationship.

Developing reliable evaluation methods

Using Ross's leadership experience and doctoral research, this training will provide a timeline for implementation across your organisation, as well as some critical tools all school leaders can introduce for appraisal, observations and research-informed practice to make meaningful conversations the heart of your organisation's pedagogy.
