Revision Revolution...

Teaching 'how to learn' ...

If we truly want to 'level up' post-pandemic, whilst funding can make some difference, there are some key strategies teachers can start to use in the classroom that make a difference. If there's one thing I have learned from 30 years in education, is that I would have been a much more effective teacher if I had learned more about explicit study techniques.

Embedding study skills into the curriculum ...

Across many schools, this dialogue is changing with many thinking much more carefully about curriculum decisions and how knowledge can be taught, assessed and embedded further to develop further schema. Teacher professional development is targeted more thoughtfully to help develop a collective approach that reaps a wide range of rewards later on.

Reshaping the revision culture ...

The Revision Revolution is a joint call to action for teachers across the country to start refining the way that they teach, how they shape professional development for themselves and the other people around them; to design a whole-school approach to improving the quality of teaching and learning. This training will give teachers the opportunity to revise their curriculum design.
